WHAT

ELECTRICITY

DOES FOR THE

HUMAN BODY

Part II. In part one was shown how electric treatment is used to supply electric currents to the nervous system, when in diseases the currents natural to the nerves are lacking in quantity. But the electro-therapist applies al-so electricity directly to the muscles of the body.

consumption for instance the muscles of the chest are often very weak, they have not power enough to expand the chest properly for inspira-tion. By applying electric currents directly to the muscles of the chest, they are brought rhytmically to con-traction and relaxation, in other words, they are compelled to perform work. Every muscle, however, that performs work gets stronger and better nourished, and in this case consequently it will expand the chest bet ter, thus bringing more oxygen into the lungs to be taken up by the blood, and in this way improving the blood and giving it more germ killing

Another instance is where muscular bodies like the uterus, have become so weak that they bend upon themselves. or the ligaments that hold them in position have atrophied muscles so that wrong position or prolapsus re-sult. The electro-therapist applies in such cases electric currents directly to the muscular substances that have become atrophied and thus brings them to their normal strength again,

able to fulfill their proper duties.

A different use of electricity is made where spasms contract any of the canals of the body, like the cesophagus, rectum et caetera. Here, of course, entirely different currents are course, entirely different currents are used that overcome the spasms and make the canals open up again for the passage of the substances for which they are intended.

which they are infended.

Where, however, canals of the body are narrowed by germ infection, causing inflamatory deposits or scar tissue, or by cancerous processes, the electro-surgeon uses again entirely different currents that dissolve the contraction reaches in the execution part of the contraction reaches. contracting parts in the canals, mak-ing them free again for passage. Elec-trical operations of this kind are en-tirely bloodless in all cases, and pain-less except in cancer cases, where very strong currents have to be used, requiring an anesthactic.
